However, previous evidence points to even larger responses to CO~2~e. [ @bib3 ] report that LBN operators with deep eustachian tubes were more comfortable with a CO~2~e of 0.30 than a neutral CO~2~e of 0.21, though participants without eustachian tubes were indifferent between the two levels. [ @bib6 ] demonstrate that the discomfort of rats is at a level of 0.39 CO~2~e, but that sensation is very short lived, so it is likely that the rats themselves have a large static threshold that is difficult to quantify. Aversive properties of end-exhaled CO~2~e can interact with the delayed effects of this gas in the lungs, as previous work has shown that delayed effects of carbon dioxide can reduce aversion to the gas ([ @bib23 ]). The current results were most consistently captured by the operator ratings, which are likely influenced by the time between target and breath. There was a difference between the ratings for the two target times, with the end of exhaled gas ratings being lower at a target time of 200 ms compared with 120 ms. A less compelling pattern was seen for the neutral gas target. Further studies are necessary to determine whether the pattern of increased aversion to end-exhaled CO<sub>2</sub> at a delay of 200 ms is related to the physiological effects of the gas. Regardless, these findings that ratings are potentially biased by physiological state should be considered when studying impacts of physiological markers on behavior. Several limitations should be addressed. First, there was a small subset of participants (*n* = 6) who had a large initial response to the CO<sub>2</sub> of 0.61. These participants had been previously identified as strong responders to CO<sub>2</sub>, and their initial responses could be considered beyond normal physiological
