Three experiments used verbal short-term memory tests to investigate the role of the target memory trace in memory performance. In each experiment, subjects completed a delayed repetition of recognition task where each to-be-recalled word was either the test word or one of two related study words. In Experiment 1, to-be-remembered and to-be-forgotten target words were separated by a two-word interstimulus interval during which subjects made unrelated decisions. Subjects were less accurate for to-be-recalled words that had been target words than for those that were not, even when the test words were unrelated to the study words. In Experiments 2 and 3, to-be-recalled and to-be-forgotten words were presented at the same time and in the same target-word order. Subjects showed no clear advantage for to-be-recalled words that had been the target words. In addition, when the to-be-remembered item was the last word presented, accuracy decreased if the target word was
