Layered clay minerals are widespread in sedimentary rocks, but the origin and evolution of these minerals is not well-understood. Even basic structural characteristics are disputed, such as the optimal thermal stability of the layered mineral. Layered materials are deposited in the Earth's crust by the replacement of more highly abundant minerals by less abundant minerals, such as feldspar and pyroxene by mica and muscovite, respectively. Layered materials also form in the upper mantle, such as the formation of serpentine in the mantle transition zone. We have analyzed the layered mineral κ-cristobalite from the Antarctic subduction zone, where it is associated with more common feldspar, pyroxene, and olivine. We applied new grinding techniques to create homogeneous materials and determine the degree of imperfection in terms of cracks and crystallographic preferred orient
