So far, connectors for optical fiber cables have been used which, for example in one, two, or more connector positions, have contact pins or ring-like contact beams arranged essentially symmetrically with respect to the longitudinal axis of the connector. This arrangement of the contact pins or contact beams in conjunction with the surrounding structure permits the optical fiber cable to be fitted easily when it is spliced and connected to another fiber cable. The front of the optical fiber cable is stripped manually and spliced. After the end of the spliced optical fiber cable is inserted into the connector, a pressure is exerted on the optical fiber cable by hand with the aid of a defined force. The contact pins or contact beams of the connector then engage the optical fiber cable. Connectors for optical fiber cables with this type of connector are disclosed, for example, in German Patent DE 43 25 890 A1, German Utility Model DE 90 12 593 U1, or German Patent DE 196 19 785 C1. Optical fiber cables are now being used increasingly which, in contrast to previous optical fiber cables, have no metal or plastic jacket; only the glass fiber strands are surrounded by a buffer, and this buffer is surrounded by a tightly winding jacket which can have a plastic or a metal outer covering. Since there are no metal or plastic shields surrounding the optical fiber strands, a considerable amount of force must be exerted on the optical fiber cable in order to tighten the contact pins or contact beams on the optical fiber cable and to keep the optical fiber cable in place. In this case, the optical fiber cable can be damaged, and the optical fiber cable can be scratched; therefore, great care must be taken for the sake of safety in the field.

$x_0, \dots$  is the solution of corresponding differential inclusion:  $(x' = f(x), x'' = g(x), x''' = h(x), \dots) \in \text{mathcal{F}}(f, g, h, \dots)$ . [T2] The set-valued map  $\text{mathcal{F}}$  is compact. We know that compactness of  $\text{mathcal{F}}$  is equivalent to compactness of  $G = \{ f \}$
