The actin cytoskeleton contributes to many cellular functions such as migration, adhesion, contraction, endocytosis, cell division and so on. It is a complex network of filaments and crosslinkers and is not uniform in its structure or distribution.

Recent work has shown that in vivo cytoskeletal organization is highly dynamic. The F-actin cytoskeleton has been shown to exhibit a very heterogeneous distribution both in space and time, with transient and functional domains. Some functional domains of actin cytoskeletal organization, such as the nucleus and focal adhesions, change in time. Similarly, the actin cytoskeleton in cells is highly mobile and dynamic. A more uniform distribution can be observed in vitro. However, these cytoskeletal systems are different from their in vivo counterparts. In this review, we will focus on the description of the organization of the actin cytoskeleton in cells and its possible comparison to in vitro systems. Search form A Show of Hands A show of hands offers a convenient way to create a probability distribution for continuous outcomes. The outcome being determined is real-valued, and the number of hands can be any positive integer. The probability of a specific outcome is just the fraction of hands showing that outcome. A key difference between this method and conventional random sampling is that the number of hands needed is not a random variable, and so does not need to be determined when the probability distribution is computed. This video demonstrates a simple example, using real data to generate a distribution using the steps that follow. The definition of a show of hands
