Applications for which microprocessors were once thought unsuitable, such as portable electronics, voice-over-data-network (VoDNet), and network appliances, are increasingly being realized. There is a corresponding increased demand for high-performance portable microprocessors, which are small, yet can perform complex computations. A limitation of many microprocessors is that they operate on bytes or partial bytes at a time. The number of operations that can be performed on bytes or partial bytes is limited by the number of operations that can be performed on a byte, by the bandwidth between the processor and the memory, and by the latency of the memory. Memory latency is often affected by the organization of the processor's cache and the number of steps needed to access the memory. These limitations may be acceptable in some instances, but in others, performance is more limited by the memory latency than the operations that can be performed on a byte. In addition to the limited number of operations that can be performed on bytes,
