Q: Quantum-mechanical toy model for a system of three distinguishable particles In a composite system of N distinguishable particles (e.g., atoms or molecules in a molecule), consider the following model. The two particles are at rest at the point of origin of the coordinate system. Particle 1 has an energy $p_1 = 0$; particle 2 has energy $p_2 = m$. So, in the frame comoving with particle 1, particle 2 has an energy $p_2 = 0$ and has therefore a nonzero velocity with respect to particle 1. What are the consequences of this fact? In particular: Wouldn't this model violate the uncertainty principle (since the kinetic energy of one particle can be zero)? Wouldn't this model necessarily imply that the center-of-mass of the system has an infinite momentum? How can this be justified? (A derivation of the center-of-mass momentum from classical arguments is also welcome, but I think that the only point that I would need to prove is that the centre- 6d1f23a050
