New trainers, when fitted with specialised slings, can be used to stabilize the back and neck of novice drivers. Drivers learning to be safe behind the wheel don't often receive hand-on-backrest schooling. In any event, if they're paying attention, they should learn to brace themselves at first. But third-year automotive engineering students at the University of Southern California are treated to a different approach. In a recent trial in which 17 students drove a Honda Civic hybrid on the campus's punishing streets, each was seated with an immobilizer-compatible manual override installed. In the event of an emergency, a command-activated device would release the safety seatbelt and immobilize the vehicle. This might be the future: backup systems are now being designed into cars for real-world use. (Image: Steven G. Peterson) The students were as keen to learn about this innovation as anyone could hope to be, and many were told that the experiment had something to do with their current coursework. The students were not deceived: in fact, they were participating in a classic classroom exercise, in which trained drivers teach novices how to drive safely. The teachers and students weren't new to this kind of activity. Professor Nicholas Bunnett, who is supervising the project for the university's Institute of Transportation Studies, says he was inspired to organise the experiment after hearing that a e79caf774b

Note that in the same images the set of patches is not large enough in one of the other classes (cars, furniture or airplanes) (a). - The current largest training set of $108\,012$ images was collected in $2013$; this is a more appropriate time to train the network as this collection reflects current technology. - The network architecture is mostly the same as [0p2017]. - The network topology is based on a CNN-LSTM model using $3$ convolutional layers (classifier) and $2$ LSTM layers (regressor). We denote as $3\times 2\times 3$ the number of cells in the first convolutional layer and $4\times 2\times 2$ the number of cells in the second layer. The final layer (8 hidden nodes) is used to train a linear SVM. The total number of parameters of our model is $6\times 10^6$. We used the original images (randomly cropped to $224\times 224$) of the three classes. For the five noisy versions of each image (adding salt, pepper, blur and plus/minus $5\%$ contrast changes) we built $5$ different noisy image datasets of size $16.2k$ ($400$ cats, $400$ dogs, $400$ flowers, $400$ playing card and $400$ cars). We will call the noisy
