AutoCAD is widely used in the manufacturing sector, with several uses including tooling design, geometric modeling, and digital fabrication. However, AutoCAD is also used by home hobbyists and amateur designers for mechanical drawings and technical blueprints. AutoCAD provides a suite of design, drafting, and other tools for the creation of two-dimensional and three-dimensional images. AutoCAD was first released as Auto-Draft for internal use by the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) for drawings of satellite vehicles and booster rockets. It was renamed AutoCAD in 1985. In 1988, AutoCAD was bundled with Maya, a 3D-modeling and animation software package, which allowed users to construct 3D images with 3D computer graphics. In 1992, AutoCAD Extended was released to allow interaction with external databases. AutoCAD was marketed as "AutoCAD LT" in 2000, and in 2008, it was rebranded as Autodesk AutoCAD software. In 2015, AutoCAD 2019 was introduced, allowing users to access information that was only previously available on the cloud with online collaboration features. History 1940s - 1950s The origins of AutoCAD and AutoCAD LT begin with Dataland Corporation, a division of the Eaton Corporation, which was founded in 1948 by O. Donald "Red" Dataland. The company produced a number of products for Eaton, most notably a computer graphics board used by vacuum tube-based computers. 1950s - 1970s In 1956, Dataland introduced a drawing system called REDAD. It was a picture-drawing system that used a cathode ray tube (CRT) display to project onto a translucent, plastic grid that was illuminated and printed on paper. The grid and photosensitive paper were handled by a photoelectric sensor that would trace the outlines of objects on the grid. Other versions of the system appeared in 1959, 1961, and 1964. In 1957, Dataland was acquired by the General Electric Company. The company, which was renamed Dataland Corporation, started using Dataland's electron beam technology for industrial control applications. In 1959, Dataland introduced the Dataland Interpreter (DAT) and Interpreter/EDC (EDC) systems. The DAT could be used by engineers to interpret information from the RCA 914, which was a type of electronic desk calculator
