A: basically, you are receiving a string of characters from the output of a command which is not what you expect. The error is misleading (see below for a step by step analysis of what is going wrong). If the command is 'ls -l' then the output (assuming you run it from a command line) is: -rwxr-xr-x 1 root root 150492 Mar 8 2014 a That is a file named a (note the three dots at the end) and a has the following permissions: -rwxr-xr-x 1 root root 150492 Mar 8 2014 a This (ok, the a) is an absolute path to the file a and not a relative one. This means that the system knows to look for a in the root folder (/). If the output of ls -l is not in the form of a pathname/filename as above but one of the form: -rw-r--r-- 1 root root 514 Nov 24 00:21 a Then you are seeing the output of a command called ls in which a has a different permissions: -rwxr-xr-x 1 root root 150492 Mar 8 2014 a In this case, ls is calling the unix tool xattr on a and that tool is setting the mode to '644' (execute with read and write). Note the absolute path used as above. If you change your output string to 'ls -l /usr/bin/a' then you will get more information (assuming that a is present in the root folder) that may help you determine why the file has the extra permissions. CC BY-ND 2.0 Andrew Carter The California Department of Food and Agriculture considers the consumer a "primary partner in the state's success," but the department is increasing its oversight of products sold in the state, a sign that California consumers may need to exercise more scrutiny of what they eat. In a statement issued this morning, the department said it will host a listening tour in April and May to solicit feedback on how California consumers think the department should best promote California's produce and other products to the public. "Food safety is a top priority," read the statement. "A growing number of incidents c6a93da74d
