In recent years, the popularity of personal computers has increased dramatically. Personal computers are commonly used for performing a large number of tasks in the everyday lives of many people. The ease with which personal computers are being used has led to their use in a wide variety of settings, including both commercial and private. One of the advantages of personal computers is that they can be used at home or while travelling. As a result, many people have at least one personal computer at home, for use at both work and home. The use of personal computers at work or at home can be a great convenience to many people. However, with the wide increase in the popularity of personal computers, the number of possible hazards to a personal computer has increased. Many of these hazards can be reduced or eliminated if a user is well informed about the personal computer and the surrounding environment. In the past, a user of a personal computer had to closely monitor the power cables and plugs to insure they were not exposed to any hazardous situations. To safeguard against accidental plugging of a power cord into an electrical socket, it is common to provide a fuse holder on the wall. Typically, such a fuse holder is designed to hold a standard household electrical fuse that may be in a variety of configurations. Another hazard that is of increased concern with the use of personal computers is the potential for electrocution. In a typical personal computer environment, it is quite common for the user to plug a cord from an external power source into a wall socket, and to plug the cord from a power supply on a personal computer into a receptacle, generally held in a separate "caddy". Therefore, the user is likely to come into contact with both the power cord and the power cord from the external power source. Cords from external power supplies are typically in the form of a flexible cord having a standard wire gauge. As a result, a user may be exposed to a hazardous situation if the power cord from the external power supply is accidentally plugged into an electrical receptacle or a socket of the computer. To avoid this, most personal computer rooms include a system for protecting against accidental connection of external power cords to external receptacles. Such a protection system may include a connector-disconnector arrangement, such that, in the event that the user inadvertently plugs a power cord from the external power supply into an external receptacle, there
